

Modernism

Charles Harrison

There are few terms upon which the weight of implication, of innuendo, and of aspiration bears down so heavily as it now does upon modernism. Recent interest in the idea of postmodernism has done nothing to lighten this load. On the contrary. The more it has seemed desirable or necessary to articulate a change of sensibility or of epoch—to define a postmodern condition—the more urgent it has become to identify just what it is that we are supposed to have outgrown or to have seen around or through. Fully to inquire into the meaning of modernism would be to do much more than to gloss a critical term. It would be to explore the etiology of a present historical situation and of its attendant forms of self-consciousness in the West.

It is a problem for any broadly conceived inquiry into the meaning of “modernism” that the term acquires a different scope and penetration in each different academic discipline. The inception of modernism in music is typically located at the close of the nineteenth century, while to talk of modernism in English literature is to focus upon a relatively limited if highly influential body of work produced in the first two decades of the twentieth century. In the history of art, on the other hand, the student of modernism can expect to run a gamut from the French painting of the 1860s to the American art of a century later and may even be directed as far back as the later eighteenth century.

There are common features to each case, however. Alike in all the arts, modernism is at some point grounded in the intentional rejection of classical precedent and classical style. Modernism is always and everywhere relative to some state of affairs conceived of as both antique and unchanging. However else its parameters may be established, “modern history” is defined as the history of a period including the present but excluding the Greek and Roman epochs. “Modern languages” are those languages which are not ancient languages but which are still adaptable and transformable for the purposes of expression. To conceive the need for a modern art is to experience one’s inherited resources of expression as if they were the forms of an ancient language, such that one’s would-be spontaneous utterances are required to conform to established patterns of rhetoric. Loosely conceived as meaning a commitment to the modern, “modernism” thus serves to declare an interest in the revision or renewal of a language and a curriculum.

Within this broad area of definition, the concept of modernism has tended to function in the discourses of art history in three different ways, according to three different though interdependent forms of usage. Since these usages are rarely explicitly distinguished, there is always a strong possibility of confusion in art-historical discussions of modernism. The first part of this text will therefore be devoted to an attempt to distinguish these different usages and to connect them to the respective interests they tend to represent. Once these differences are acknowledged it may be possible to reestablish some common ground.

First, then, and most widely, modernism is used to refer to the distinguishing characteristics of Western culture from the mid-nineteenth century until at least the mid-twentieth: a culture in which processes of industrialization and urbanization are conceived of as the principal mechanisms of transformation in human experience. At the commencement of his influential essay “The Metropolis and Modern Life,” published in 1902–03, Georg Simmel wrote, “The deepest problems of modern life derive from the claim of the individual to preserve the autonomy and individuality of his existence in the face of overwhelming social forces” (Simmel 1902–03, 130). In this form modernism is regarded both as a condition consequent upon certain broad economic, technological, and political tendencies and as a set of attitudes towards those tendencies. This first sense of modernism may thus be said to have both a passive and an active aspect. Under the former it refers to that cluster of social and psychological conditions which modernization accomplishes or imposes, for good or ill. Under the latter it refers to the positive inclination to “modernize.” As thus understood, modernism may be vividly exemplified through the stylistic and technical properties of works of art, but it will also be recognizable in certain social forms and practices and in the determining priorities of certain institutions, such as museums, or universities, or financial markets.

In our first sense, then, “modernism” is the substantive form of the adjective “modern,” while the condition it denotes is virtually synonymous with the experience of modernity. When Charles Baudelaire issued his call for a “painting of modern life,” what he was asking was that painters should seek to capture this experience by isolating the distinctive appearances of the age: “the ephemeral, the fugitive, the contingent, the half of art whose other half is the eternal and the immutable” (Baudelaire 1863, 12; see also Baudelaire 1846). To speak in this sense of the modernism of a work of art is to refer to its engagement with preoccupations and spectacles specific to the age. Thus Manet’s Olympia of 1863 (Plate 11.1) might count as a work endowed with modernism by virtue of the figurative terms in which it reworks the classical precedent it invokes: the type of the reclining Venus as painted by Giorgione and Titian. It is of particular relevance in this connection that Manet’s staging of his picture serves to place the nude woman in the contingent situation of a prostitute or, more precisely, that it serves to place the spectator in the imaginary position of a prostitute’s client. By this means, we might say, the painting brings home a kind of truth about the meaning of love in a modern world—a world in which sooner or later everything is brought to the marketplace to have its value established and to become a commodity. In the language of modernism the classical “goddess of love” thus becomes translated into “a prostitute.”

FROM: CRITICAL TERMS FOR ART HISTORY

11.1 Edouard Manet, Olympia, 1865. Musée Orsay, Paris. Photo: Réunion des Musées Nationaux, Paris.

The topicality of this image is easily enough established. In Baudelaire’s “The Painter of Modern Life,” for instance, a section on “Women and Prostitutes” follows the section on “Modernity.” This highly influential essay was first published at the close of the year in which Olympia was painted. Historical research will further confirm that the prevalence of prostitution in the Paris of the 1860s was a matter not only of fascination in artistic circles but also of concern to the police and to the civil authorities. In this first sense of modernism, then, Manet’s painting qualifies on the basis of its demonstrable relevance to the wider issues of contemporary social life.

The concept of modernism is also used in a more specialized sense, however, not to evoke the whole field of modern social existence but to distinguish a supposedly dominant tendency in modern culture. To employ the concept of modernism in this second sense is to convey an evaluative judgment concerning those aspects of culture which are found to be “live” or “critical.” Modernism in this second sense refers specifically to the modern tradition in high art and to the grounds on which a truly modern art may be distinguished not only from classical, academic, and conservative types of art but also, crucially, from the forms of popular and mass culture. The most influential spokesman for this view of modernism was the American critic Clement Greenberg. In his first major essay, published in 1939, Greenberg distinguished between the art of the avant-garde and “kitsch,” by which term he derogated the synthetic products alike of the modern academy and of urbanized mass culture. The role of the avant-garde, he believed, was “to keep culture moving.” Kitsch, on the other hand, was “the epitome of all that is spurious in the life of our times” (Greenberg 1939, 8–12).

It should be clear that where the impetus of modernism is thus associated with the practices of the avant-garde, the principal function of any generalization across different cultural forms and social practices must be to provide a background of contrasts. The point becomes clearer the more the concept of modernism is distinguished from its partial synonym, modernity. Modernity is a condition that the work of art both distills from and shares with the encompassing culture, which must include what Greenberg called kitsch. In its second form of usage, on the other hand, “modernism” implies a property that must be principally internal to the practice or medium in question. As thus understood, modernism is representative of the broad experience of modernity only insofar as that experience may have to be confronted in the continuing pursuit of aesthetic standards set by the art of the past.

These standards are defined by human capacities and they therefore remain as constant as those capacities themselves. The conditions of attaining them are continually changing, however, both because history entails change and because what has been once made cannot be made again as a vehicle for the same values. The achievement of modernism in art is thus seen as involving both a requirement of continuity and a crucial requirement of originality with regard to other—and specifically recent—art. According to the later suggestions of Greenberg, what specifically establishes the modernism of a discipline or a medium is not that it reveals an engagement with the representative concerns of the age, but rather that its development is governed by self-critical procedures addressed to the medium itself. “The essence of Modernism lies, as I see it, in the use of the characteristic methods of a discipline to criticize the discipline itself—not in order to subvert it, but to entrench it more firmly in its area of competence” (Greenberg 1960, 85). As thus understood, what modernism stands for is the critical achievement of an aesthetic standard within a given medium and in face of (though emphatically not in disregard of) the pervasive condition of modernity. The adjectival form of this “modernism” is not “modern” but “modernist.” Thus, what Greenberg called kitsch may be modern, but insofar as it is defined as unself-critical and unoriginal, it cannot qualify as modernist.

According to this second usage, then, to label a modern form of art as modernist is to stress both its intentional and self-critical preoccupation with the demands of a specific medium, and its originality with regard to the precedents that medium avails. Thus for Greenberg, Manet's paintings "became the first Modernist ones" not primarily by virtue of their picturing of circumstances redolent of modern life, but "by virtue of the frankness with which they declared the surfaces on which they were painted" (Greenberg 1960, 86). According to Greenberg's scheme, "Flatness, two-dimensionality, was the only condition painting shared with no other art" (87). Insofar as flatness is thus identified as painting's unique "area of competence," the frank acknowledgment of surface becomes the condition to which the self-critical modernist painting must tend. Viewed from within this framework of ideas, the significant encounter staged by Manet's Olympia is not the psychologically or sociologically topical confrontation between prostitute and client but the technically critical relationship between pictorial illusion and decorated surface. Where the aesthetic tuning of this latter relationship is seen as the crucial condition of the painting's individuality, the real-life scenario to which that painting makes reference must be relegated to the status of a mere starting point or pretext. Within this frame of reference it will not be appropriate to ask whether modernism's testimony to the historical character of the epoch is of an active or a passive nature. Rather, it is assumed that the real testimony a painting such as Olympia has to offer is the incidental but inescapable product of an engagement with problems which are primarily aesthetic. That testimony is the more reliable for being involuntary, and in that sense disinterested.

In this second sense of modernism it will clearly be inappropriate to speak in one and the same breath of a modernist artwork and a modernist institution. There is no reason to assume that the practices and priorities which govern the conduct of a social engagement or the running of a museum will be consonant with those which determine the production of a painting. Nor is there reason to believe that the relative modernism of an institution can be an issue in the same sense that it may be where the critical development of a painting is at stake. Indeed, for those subscribing to the second sense of modernism, there is every reason to assume the contrary. Michael Fried wrote in 1965,

While modernist painting has increasingly divorced itself from the concerns of the society in which it precariously flourishes, the actual dialectic by which it is made has taken on more and more of the denseness, structure and complexity of moral experience—that is, of life itself, but life lived as few are inclined to live it: in a state of continuous intellectual and moral alertness (Fried 1965, 773).

The apparent implication of Fried's thesis is that it is only by divorcing itself from the "concerns of society" that modernist painting has been able to draw upon the creative dialectic by which its aesthetic or ethical virtue is sustained.

In its second sense, then, the term "modernism" is used to refer to a supposed tendency in art in which a special, "aesthetic" form of virtue and integrity is pursued at the apparent expense of social-historical topicality or relevance.

According to this usage, it is commitment to the priority of aesthetic issues that primarily qualifies modernist art as the high art of the age. In turn, what qualifies the artist is a subjection to the demands of the medium, which has become indistinguishable from the demand of truth to oneself.

And so to the last of our usages. This third sense of "modernism" is distinguished from the second not so much by a difference in field of reference as by a distancing from the terms in which that field is represented. This distancing might be thought of as the equivalent of a shift from oratio recta to oratio obliqua. In this last sense "modernism" stands not for the artistic tendency it designates under the second usage, but rather for the usage itself and for a tendency in criticism which this usage is thought to typify. A Modernist, in this sense, is seen not primarily as a kind of artist, but rather as a critic whose judgments reflect a specific set of ideas and beliefs about art and its development. (From this point on, this third sense of "modernism" will be capitalized in order to preserve its distinctness from the first and second usages.) Thus understood, a Modernist critical tradition emerged in France in the later nineteenth century, to be first codified in the writings of Maurice Denis, was developed in England in the first three decades of the twentieth century, principally by Clive Bell, Roger Fry, and R. H. Wilenski, and was brought to its paradigmatic form in America between the end of the 1930s and the end of the 1960s, notably in the work of Clement Greenberg and subsequently of Michael Fried. (In fact, as implied earlier, there is now a gathering tendency to trace the origins of Modernist theories back before the beginning of the nineteenth century. The identification of Modernism with Greenberg's writing remains so firmly established in the sphere of art, however, that to talk of a tradition of Modernist art criticism is in effect to consider the antecedents of Greenbergian theory as these may be established with benefit of hindsight.)

It should be clear that to distinguish this third usage of "modernism" from the second—or to distinguish between modernism (conceived as an artistic tendency) and Modernism (conceived as a critical tradition)—is effectively to stand outside the framework of Modernist criticism itself. For Greenberg and the early Fried, modernist painting and modernist sculpture were the forms of art, at once self-consciously modern and qualitatively significant, which their criticism was intended to pick out. What they meant by modernism was the property or tendency they saw as common to the works thus isolated—works by Manet, Cézanne, Picasso, Matisse, Miró, Pollock, Louis, Noland, Olitski—not the procedures by which their own singling out was done.

We have seen that Greenberg's sense of modernism depends upon the possibility of distinguishing an authentic, avant-garde, modernist art from an inauthentic, "kitsch" popular culture. From Greenberg's point of view these distinctions were intrinsically significant. From the perspective of broader cultural studies, however, no such distinction could be disinterested. It becomes clear that the ground on which distance is established from the valuations of the Modernist more or less coincides with the first position regarding the meaning of modernism; with the view, that is to say, that the important distinguishing characteristic of a modern art is to be found—or ought to be found—in its manifest coincidence with the social and psychological condition of modernity. For the advocates of cultural studies—now certainly in the majority among students of the modern in art—there can be only one good reason to single out a modern art as “modernist”; that is when it is seen as subservient in practice to a Modernist theory already formulated in criticism or art history and when this subservience is regarded as a limit on its modernity. As regards such recent and current art as they approve, non-Modernists may well find the term “modern” sufficient. Indeed, it will be an advantage of this term that it enables and encourages theory to range over all forms of culture, high and “popular” alike.

An example will help to clarify the point. In discussing the “modernist art” of the 1960s, both Greenberg and Fried made various forms of reference to the work of the painters Jules Olitski and Kenneth Noland and of the sculptor Anthony Caro. What these critics intended to convey by such references was that the work in question was both original vis-à-vis the modern traditions of painting and sculpture respectively and of critical significance vis-à-vis the “mere novelties” of consumer culture and popular art. But in the utterance of those to whom Greenberg and Fried appeared as ideologists of Modernism, the labeling of Olitski or Noland or Caro as a Modernist was a means to convey a quite different valuation. For the non-Modernist, the term tended to carry the pejorative implication that the artist’s work was submissive to a form of critical prescription, and was thus unoriginal. On the one hand this submission was seen as preventing the work in question from being fully engaged with the modern in all its aspects. On the other the supportive criticism was seen as masking the work’s actual implication in forms of privileged consumership.

Controversy over the meaning of modernism can now be seen as having been central to modern debate about the meaning and value of art and culture. The relevant issues have conventionally been polarized along the following lines. Should we measure all forms of cultural production alike according to what we might summarily call their realism, meaning the extent of their implication in the pressing concerns of human social existence, the adjustment of their technical properties in the light of that implication, and the consequent breadth of their potential constituency? Is art, in the last resort, subject to the same kinds of critical demands as we might apply to any other component of the social fabric? Is Olympia to be esteemed for the truths it seems to make palpable—truths about the nature of exploitation and oppression (of one class and gender by another class and gender) and about the forms of hypocrisy and alienation which are required of the respective parties to the resulting exchanges? Or is a preoccupation with such issues in the end distracting from the actual properties of this or any painting, that is, distracting from those properties the painting has as distinct from such properties as may be attributed to the motifs it illustrates? Does the true critical potential of culture lie, as the Modernist would have it, in its autonomy vis-à-vis social and utilitarian considerations and in its pursuit of the aesthetic as an end in itself? Are the forms of fine art distinguished by the fact that they enable an unusually concentrated pursuit of this end? Should we aim to judge Olympia on its formal properties as a painting and thus to set aside whatever emotions may be aroused by the scene it depicts—or, as Greenberg would put it, by its “literature” (see Greenberg 1967, 271–72)?

As implied, the priorities of “realism” and Modernism are here presented so as to appear more clearly polarized than they tend to be in practice. I mean to make amends in due course. We should first acknowledge, however, that Modernism has indeed been widely represented as a critical tendency incompatible with realism—and with some apparent justice. In all phases of its development Modernist theory has rested upon three crucial assumptions. The first is that nothing about art matters so much as its aesthetic merit. In Greenberg’s words, “You cannot legitimately want or hope for anything from art except quality” (Greenberg 1967, 267). The second is that for the purposes of criticism the important historical development is the one that connects works of the highest aesthetic merit. As already suggested, the true Modernist is interested in the whole “visual culture” only as the background against which exceptional works may be distinguished. Greenberg again: “Art has its history as a sheer phenomenon, and it also has its history as quality” (267). The third is that where aesthetic judgments appear to be in conflict with moral judgments, with political commitments, or with the concerns of society, what should be examined first is not the aesthetic judgment, which the Modernist considers involuntary and thus not open to revision (265), but the grounds of the moral judgment or the political commitment, or the relevance of the social concerns. In the words of the English Modernist Clive Bell, “when you treat a picture as a work of art, you have . . . assigned it to a class of objects so powerful and direct as means to spiritual exaltation that all minor merits are inconsiderable. Paradoxical as it may seem, the only relevant qualities in a work of art, judged as art, are artistic qualities” (Bell [1914] 1987, 117). This issue of relevance is crucial to Modernist concepts of the autonomy of aesthetic value. In Greenberg’s view moralizing judgment is typically rooted in response to the illustrative content of the work of art and is therefore irrelevant to the quality of the work’s aesthetic effect, unless, that is, it can be shown just how it is that that effect becomes “impregnated” by the illustrative content (Greenberg 1967, 271).

There are various questions which these assumptions have seemed automatically to invite. How are we to assure ourselves that what the Modernist critic represents as aesthetic merit is actually an objective and separable property of the work of art? Or to put it another way, why should we accept the view that judgments of taste are involuntary and unsubjective and thus categorically distinct from mere assertions of preference and self-interest? What if it transpired that the supposed aesthetic properties were actually the reflections of the critic's own psychological disposition and self-interest? What if the Modernist's requirement of relevance to the quality of effect were a mere formalism—a methodological device serving to protect works of art, and judgments about them, from inquiry into the historical and ethical materials of which these works and those judgments may actually have been constituted? Whose interests are likely to be best served by maintaining high art as a realm insulated against troubling social considerations? It is not hard to see where this line of questioning might be taken. Nor is it hard to understand how it has come about that, while "modernism" remains available as a term of reference to Western culture during the course of a specific (possibly elapsed) historical period, "Modernism" is now often consigned to the company of such terms as "conservatism" or "the ideology of the ruling class" or "business as usual."

It is as well that these different points of view should be identified. As suggested earlier, discussion of the meaning of modernism is liable to be confused and confusing so long as it remains unclear what kinds of critical programs and positions are variously at stake. Now that the grounds of opposition have been described, however—perhaps, for the sake of argument, slightly exaggerated—we can finally attempt to reestablish some common ground. The aim is twofold: to sketch out a framework of practical observations upon which an understanding of modernism may be allowed to expand, and to see whether certain of the procedures and priorities of Modernism may not after all be rendered compatible with "realist" interests. With this end in view we return to the much-cited example of Manet's Olympia.

Let us say, for the sake of argument, that what is meant in talking of the modernism of Olympia is not adequately substantiated either by reference to the topicality or realism of its theme, or by reference to the self-critical frankness of its formal and decorative organization. Rather what is at issue is the position in which the painting places its spectator. The notion of a hypothetical position here functions to bring together in the experience of the spectator two aspects which Modernist criticism has tended to prize apart: the painting's topical pictorial aspect, or its "modernity," and its self-critical formal aspect, or its "modernism." Thus what I mean by "position" is the same imaginary state that is defined for the spectator not only by the painting's pictorial theme (when it has one) but also by its formal and decorative properties. What I mean by "spectator" is someone who is not only competent to identify the pictorial theme (when there is one), and not only disposed to view the painting's formal and decorative properties as significant of some human intention, but also disposed to exert his or her critical and imaginative faculties in pursuit of the intention in question. This spectator is a person who works.

As regards the pictorial theme of Olympia, we have already suggested that this functions so as to induce the spectator into the imaginary role of the client. Richard Wollheim has suggested that there are paintings by Manet which include a "spectator in the picture" as part of their content (Wollheim 1987, 101–85 passim). This is not actually a person represented in the picture but someone whose experience or "repertoire" is supposed to be represented by it, as if he or she were standing in front of the scene in reality and experiencing it as the painting shows it. In proposing that Olympia has a "spectator in the picture" we would effectively be saying that no experience of the painting can be adequate—whether it be the experience of a male or of a female spectator—unless it involves some imaginary occupation of the role of the client as the picture presupposes him.

The making of such a requirement on the painting's behalf would certainly be consistent with a claim regarding its realism. But we are also allowing it to be crucial to the effect of the painting that it is seen as a painting. This is to say that however absorbing the staging of the picture may be, the self-consciousness of the actual spectator—both his or her reflective critical ability and his or her bodily self-awareness—is never entirely lost before the decorated surface of the canvas. If we can talk of a position established by the painting, then, it must be one in which the spectator's occupation of the imaginary role of client can be made to coincide with his or her critical perception of the actual painted surface. This is not as bizarre a prospect as it may at first seem. It is an identifying condition of the spectator in the picture that "he can see everything that the picture represents and he can see it as the picture represents it" (Wollheim 1987, 102). But everything which the painting represents is also included in what the actual spectator sees. Wollheim suggests that the frank activity on the surface of Manet's paintings serves to recall the actual spectator from the imaginary world of the spectator in the picture to the experience of painting's "two-foldness" (168): the sense of its surface as at one and the same time literally marked and containing an illusion, which Wollheim sees as a condition necessary to representation (21). We might go further, however. As we attend to the literal nature of the surface, what are we to make of our imaginary identification with the position of the client? If we follow Greenberg and play the Modernist, as this identification becomes a part of the "literary content" of the painting, so it excludes itself from any responsibility for the quality of the painting's effect. The "position" the painting establishes, then, is one in which this identification is both included and, as it were, superseded through a process of aesthetic exertion. It is as if, in fully engaging with the surface of the painting, we were empowered to look past or through the spectator in the picture and to identify our looking with that which looks back: not only to admit the presence of the literal decorated surface, but simultaneously to occupy that imaginary position from which the woman lying on the bed looks out.

The moral seems to be that strictures on relevance are not necessarily restricting on inquiry into works of art. They may rather function as forms of self-critical injunction, serving engaged spectators to distinguish the grounds of their interests and assumptions from the realistic materials of which a given work is composed. In the case of a painting, these last will include both its topical connections with the world and its literal decorated surface. In the case of Olympia, it is at the point at which the formal and practical properties of the painting are allowed most fully to determine our experience that we are perhaps closest to seeing what it is that the painting must indeed have been made of. It is as if we (including the female we) had to pass through the route of what the client is defined as seeing—self-critically to match that seeing against a more assiduous form of attention in which the literal surface makes its presence felt—before we can come to see what it is that the surface actually makes visible.

It would be unduly sentimental to associate this “making visible” with the self-consciousness of the represented woman. There can be only one consciousness at work in the encounter between painting and spectator. What is thought and felt is what is thought and felt by this spectator alone. But there may nevertheless be a quite specific form of thinking and feeling for which the antecedent consciousness of the spectator is not a sufficient condition and for which the painting is the necessary occasion. What we can say is that the painter of Olympia has so marshalled and organized his practical and figurative materials that a quite specific condition or moment of self-consciousness is represented in the imagination of the sufficiently engaged spectator: a spectator, that is to say, who will see everything the painting shows and nothing that it does not.

The claim, then, is that it is crucial to the effect in question that it be dependent both upon the modernity of the painting’s figurative scenario, rooted as this is in a specific form of social and psychological context, and upon the modernism of those formal properties which are independent of that scenario’s particularities: the relative explicitness of the facture and the consequent stressing of the picture plane, the relative flatness of the pictorial space, the tendency for the literal framing edge to be acknowledged as a significant compositional element or limit, and so on. This point will become immediately clearer if Olympia is compared—as it was at the time of its first exhibition in 1865—to the kind of more standard Salon composition in which a recognizably “classical” Venus is located in a virtually limitless illusionistic space, on the other side of an entirely transparent picture plane. Cabanel’s Birth of Venus won the official laurels in the Salon of 1865 and has furnished grounds of contrast to Manet’s work ever since. In the deep space of (neoclassical and thus unmodern) fantasy such as this the represented woman is left undistinguished by the signifiers of class, which is to say she is available to serve as an ideal. In this world there are neither prohibitions nor prices. The space of Manet’s painting, on the other hand, is the space of (modern) imagination. I take imagination to be a realistic faculty, and thus to be radically distinct from fantasy—albeit it is the persistent tendency of modern culture to conflate fantasy and imagination.

Olympia’s world, that is to say, is a world in which actions have imaginable consequences and pleasures are paid for, in which flesh bruises and others also have minds.

In 1965 Michael Fried wrote of Manet as “the first painter for whom consciousness itself is the great subject of his art” (Fried 1965, 774), thus revising the terms in which Greenberg had five years earlier set Manet at the commencement of modernist painting’s trajectory. I do not think it matters whether or not it is Manet’s consciousness that we see Olympia as representing: whether, for example, we conceive of what we “see” in looking past the client as the painter’s empathetic projection into the woman’s role. The point is that the form of attention the painting both demands and defines is one that results in a form of critical consciousness: a responsive awareness not only of the painting as object, but of the rich but determinate range of metaphorical meanings the surface of that object, in all its plenitude and its particularity, is enabled to sustain; a self-consciousness awareness, that is to say, of that which is other.

I propose that it is precisely in the painting’s capacity thus to determine the attention of the spectator that both its realism and its modernism may be said to lie. And I do not believe that it would be particularly easy or helpful, at this juncture, to distinguish just which sense of modernism is at stake. What we can say is that it is just this possibility—the possibility that, however each and every spectator actually responds to the given work of art, insofar as any response is determined by the work of art, it is critically determined in exactly the same way for each person—that allows the Modernist to conceive of taste as possibly objective. For if the picture can indeed be said to be the final arbiter of that which it is relevant to say of it, then we will be availed of a powerful control on mere expressions of self-interest. Of course to propose that the work of art is the final arbiter of our relevant experience is to talk of how “experience” may be sensibly conceived for the purposes of criticism. It is emphatically not to attribute to works of art a mysterious agency which would allow them somehow to control interpretations. Nor is it to claim that all or any accounts of the experience of a given work of art must converge on a single pattern isomorphous with it. Why should we expect such convergence to be a tendency of our speakings and writings about art?

It will not be equally true of all works of art that they succeed in determining what it is relevant to say of them. Indeed, the degree of their success in doing so may be significant of other forms of relative success or failure. I assume that a painting which achieves an identification of realism with modernism will have earned its capacity to determine the spectator’s attention. To put the matter in the form of a generalization, we might say that any and all art is impaired to the extent that, when it is considered as intentional under some description, modernism and realism respectively can with justice be predicated of different and separable aspects and properties. (The generalization serves to make the point that the “unity” of a composition is far from being a simply technical issue.) A painting which fails or evades the challenge to identify realism with modernism may well find itself left without significant remainder in the face of supervening critical interests. To talk of conservative realism or of antirealist modernism is to conjure up forms of art capable of holding the spectator's attention only when critical and imaginative faculties are for one reason or another subjected or suspended.

In this essay much has been made to hang upon a painting now well over a century old. What of subsequent developments? I have meant to suggest that the supposed modernist "orientation to flatness" and the matching Modernist stricture on relevance may alike be interpreted as means to address the realistic conditions of self-consciousness in the modern spectator. Another way to put this point would be to say that the continuing function of a modernist culture—an "avant-garde" culture, if we borrow Greenberg's distinction—is to confront the occasions of fantasy and distraction with the requirements of imagination and critical self-awareness. Pictorial scenarios such as Olympia's are among the means by which the modernist work of art may summon up the inauthentic modes of experience—the dead areas of culture—that it means critically to diagnose and to distance. But, as Greenberg and subsequently Fried were concerned to make clear, however engaging such scenarios may seem to be—however vividly they evoke a history and a sociology—they are not necessary to the successful undertaking of the modernist critical task. This was the crucial lesson of the abstract art of the early twentieth century. Later painters such as Mark Rothko and Barnett Newman showed that a field of color could be enough, so long as it was made the occasion of some dialectical play between the literal and the metaphorical. It transpired that all that is required for the achievement of modernism is that the work of art should establish its comparability to some current mode or style of the inauthentic (the idealized, the sentimental, the euphemistic in our culture), and that it should be capable of making its own critical distinctness palpable in the experience of the imaginatively engaged spectator. I say "all," but of course this achievement is no easier or less complex in so-called abstract art than it is in figurative work. It follows that there are no reasons in principle why the realism of Rothko's work or Newman's should not be valued as highly as the realism of Manet's. Insofar as they have worked to explain the requirements in question, those labeled as Modernist critics can with justice be viewed as qualified representatives of modernism in art, while insofar as these requirements may still be relevant to the conduct of art, associations of Modernism with conservatism may require some reconsideration. A fortiori, announcements of the demise of modernism or of Modernism may turn out to be self-interested, or premature, or both.

SUGGESTED READINGS

- Baudelaire, Charles. [1846] 1965. Art in Paris, 1845–1862.
 ———. [1863] 1964. The Painter of Modern Life and Other Essays.

- Bell, Clive. [1914] 1987. Art.
 Clark, T. J. 1985. The Painting of Modern Life: Paris in the Art of Manet and His Followers.
 Fried, Michael. 1965. Three American Painters: Kenneth Noland, Jules Olitski, Frank Stella.
 ———. 1967. "Art and Objecthood."
 Fry, Roger. [1920] 1981. Vision and Design.
 Greenberg, Clement. 1939. "Avant Garde and Kitsch."
 ———. 1960. "Modernist Painting."
 ———. 1967. "Complaints of an Art Critic."
 Harrison, Charles, and Paul Wood, eds. 1992. Art in Theory 1900–1990.
 Simmel, Georg. 1902–03. "The Metropolis and Modern Life."
 Wilenski, R. H. 1927. The Modern Movement in Art.
 Wollheim, Richard. 1987. Painting as an Art.