The first was a familiar strategy from ⁺Spanish conquests: enlisting one indigenous group to fight the other. In the aftermath of the 1695 Pima Revolt, the Spanish insisted these Indians attack the Apache to demonstrate their loyalty to the Crown. Another tactic the Spanish hoped might stem the tide of Apache raiding was extending the presidio system.

Outcropping of silver ore in a location, they call that: "place of the small spring" they also find some migrants from another place, and those people showed them a mix of benefits and challenges to the colonial rule. Because of those the variety of those people and their background, it was so hard for them putting those people in the same control system. And also because of the feature of those Migrants, people even call them "rootless vagabonds"

Those people who are colonized are the most significant source of Spanish at that time. Because everyone who was colonized at that time was different, they came from a different place with different skills and because People who were colonized by Spanish at that time most of them are sent to war, there are so many skill and cultures were disappear at that time.

If we compare the various sources, I think those people who comes the "place of the small spring" are more useful and Because of their talent, culture and skills, Spanish, Spanish were challenged firstly by them.

Women were always the victim or the vulnerable during that time, and barely have the right of speech unless men need them. At the beginning of this chapter, it mentioned a lot of detail about how women were killed at that time and some of enemy rape women before they kill them. For example: "Similarly, he made no mention of a large number of women slain in the raid or the probable rape of several Apache women the moments before their deaths." We can notice that there is no human right among those female victim and I think the fundamental reason that women are lack of human right is the result of distribution of work among women and men since ancient time. However, male, an example of Apache, they were live with ribbing since long time ago, and this kind of lifestyle due to they think family is less important than other things. It also explained why those worriers would leave their women while the men were "off roaming about committing deed of murder and theft"
